It is far too rare for scholars from different disciplines and methodological camps to have a chance to talk and write together in search of common ground. Specialization, departmentalization, professional demands—all make such experiences impractical and unlikely. Yet the authors of this volume were given such an opportunity. For this opportunity, we must thank Charles Bazerman. In a series of in-person retreats and virtual conferences over the course of four years, we were able to pursue our joint interest in lifespan writing development. Chuck brought this group together, kept us together, challenged us, encouraged us, and in his gentle way never for a minute let us off the hook. We worked hard because we saw him working even harder—making sure everyone had a say, keeping us on task, articulating our commonalities, respecting our differences, and insisting on productive understandings. He also made sure that after each long, intense day of work at the University of California, Santa Barbara campus, we would be refreshed by visits to the beach, tours of the mountains, and convivial and healthful meals. We are grateful to Chuck for his vision, leadership, and selflessness.

The Spencer Foundation provided a conference grant that paid for logistics and staff support for our meetings over several years. We are grateful to Spencer for the trust they put in our interdisciplinary effort and their commitment to improving research and teaching in writing across the lifespan. Thanks also to the Gevirtz Graduate School of Education at UC Santa Barbara for providing meeting space and additional support.

Our work was made easier, livelier, and better organized by the contributions of Ryan Dippre and Erika I-Tremblay, who served at different times as assistants to this project. They each did a remarkably patient job of transcribing hours of recorded discussion and offered timely observations and aid.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Thanks to Kurt Austin, publications director at the National Council of Teachers of English, for his encouragement and attention during the review and production process. We are especially grateful to Kurt for his willingness to work with so many coauthors. Thanks also to the anonymous reviewers who helped us in our final push to completion.

During the course of our work, our incomparable colleague Arthur Applebee fell ill, and he died before this volume was completed. When he was with us, we could count on Arthur to bring the discussions back from the brink of confusion or triviality. He kept our sights on the big picture, and he had a remarkable ability to synthesize and restate our disparate thoughts in a way that would end an impasse and take our work to higher ground. Those familiar with Arthur's scholarship are likely to hear his voice most directly in the second chapter, but his voice continues to resonate in all of us who had the privilege and luck to be in his sphere of influence. Thanks to Arthur's colleagues, Kristen Wilcox and Jill Jeffery, for joining the research team and helping to bring the book to fruition. Thanks also to Judith Langer for her assistance. The Lifespan Development of Writing is dedicated to the memory of Arthur Applebee.
